What is a School Wellness Policy?

Since 2006, a school that participates in the national school lunch or breakfast program, is required to have in place a local wellness policy to help address childhood obesity. The law places the responsibility of developing a wellness policy at the local level so the individual needs of each school can be addressed.

The local wellness policy must include, at minimum:

- Goals for nutrition promotion and education
- Goals for physical activity
- Goals for other school-based activities that promote wellness
- Nutrition guidelines that promote student health and reduce childhood obesity for all foods available on each school campus during the school day

Who should be involved?

The law requires schools to involve a variety of people to develop, carry out, review and update the policy unique to their community. A school should permit the following people on its school wellness committee:

parents
School Health Professionals
teachers of physical education
representatives of the school
food authority STUDENTS
school administrators
THE GENERAL PUBLIC
school board

In 2010, the Healthy, Hunger-Free Kids Act added school wellness policies. Now schools must report to the public about their progress made in reaching goals and how the policy compares to standards.

TAKING ACTION:

- Ask to join your district wellness committee or school health advisory council (SHAC). OR
- Join or start a wellness team at your school and create your own guidelines to improve student health.
- Assess school health programs using the School Health Index self-assessment tool. (www.cdc.gov/HealthyYouth/SHI) OR
- Evaluate your school's policy strength using the Wellness Policy Assessment Tool (WELLSAT) from the Rudd Center for Food Policy & Obesity. (www.wellsat.org)

STORIES from the Field

Laredo Elementary School (Laredo, Mo.)

The school wellness committee went before the school board and got the written policy changed to increase recess an extra five minutes for a total of 20 minutes every day.

Grundy High School (Galt, Mo.)

The school wellness committee implemented a staff worksite health promotion program. Educational materials were distributed and pedometers were awarded to all participants.
